particular an exhaust gas turbocharger (EGT) for compression of air within an engine. A known turbocharger of this type is described in U.S.
Pat. No. 4,230,231, and comprises a motor mounted on a hollow shaft within a compressor housing which, in turn, is mounted in the cylinder head of the engine. This known turbocharger exhibits several disadvantages as compared with the turbocharger according to the present invention. The motor is connected to the shaft by a coupling mechanism comprising a non-rotating sleeve mounted in the motor and a rotatable sleeve mounted on the shaft. This sleeve is provided with a magnetic fluid coupling, which operates when the motor is driven. On rotation of the shaft, the sleeve mounted on the shaft is pulled back into the motor against the action of a spring, and this rotates the sleeve within the motor. This coupling mechanism has the disadvantage that it is bulky, costly, and prone to mechanical failure. The coupling is also particularly difficult to assemble. Also, the motor is mounted on the hollow shaft, which has a hollow circular cross-section, so that, during operation, some of the heat from the motor is transferred into the coolant for the engine. Another disadvantage of the known turbocharger is that the motor is connected to the shaft by coupling which extends through the motor housing and contains a protective oil film. This shaft is externally to the turbocharger and is able to be driven into rotation at high speed. Because the coupling extends through the housing, the path
