Research is published in journals, which can take months to years to be published and it is peer-reviewed. The review process is time-consuming, requires expertise and is sometimes subjective. This means that only a small fraction of researchers will be able to access the results of a study, and that most studies will never be subjected to a rigorous review process. Research communities are interested in publishing in top-tier journals, for the prestige it brings. The wider public is often interested in published results, but journals are interested in the number of citations they generate, and are not interested in attracting broad public interest. Both authors and publishers look for ways to increase the influence and appeal of their publications. An alternative, open, online platform exists for researchers to share research and communicate their work. For researchers, it saves time, is reproducible and it reduces the cost of publishing. For publishers, it eliminates the need to buy journals and allows them to focus on the work of sharing research. For the wider public, it offers new ways to access and judge research and is accessible. For the research community, it offers new ways to share work and interact with each other. ArXiv is an online repository for research, providing the only peer-reviewed, open access to scholarly communication. Anyone can upload and share their work, and it is freely available. The platform offers a standard format for sharing papers and other scholarly outputs and means that research is accessible to the wider public, and for the scientific community, for comment and discussion. ArXiv supports open access. There is no publisher or owner of the platform. It is a web platform that anyone can contribute to and use. The content is freely accessible to all. The only barrier is time: if a paper is accepted, it needs to be published quickly and the authors need to think of ways to describe their work in a way that is simple and accessible for others to understand. For these reasons, ArXiv is the major online repository for research outputs, with
