Aperture has long been used for photo editing and retouching. The program offers many tools for manipulating a photo's color, contrast, saturation, and more. Aperture's interface and features are a little different from Photoshop's and user-friendly. No longer in direct competition with Photoshop, Aperture has become more of a hobbyist program than a serious competitor. Aperture is a non-linear, non-destructive and image-based retouching and photo editing application. It is used mostly by photographers. F-Spot is a file manager and photo organizer in the GNOME desktop environment. It is meant to be a personal photo organizer, display photos, manage photo metadata and organize photos by photo events. Note: The more important features are listed first. FEATURES At first glance, F-Spot may look like a photo viewer. However, most people would be surprised to learn that it's much more than that: for example, it's an organizer, a viewer, a photo browser, a web browser, a slideshow creator, a photo editor, a slideshow organizer, a picture editor, a color converter, a printer, a file manager, a disk burner, a cd burner, a calendar, an audio file player, a CD/DVD player, a text editor, a log file writer, a note writer, an instant messenger, an IRC client and even a "drawing" program. F-Spot can do all this while keeping itself entirely out of your way. You can easily organize your photos, email your photos and videos, copy and move your files and easily share them with the other users on your network. You can browse thumbnails of photos, view photos online, organize photos by time, date, location, genre, color or even by event. You can create slideshows, view pictures taken with your camera and even add pictures taken with other digital cameras. You can also access all your pictures online through your FTP or HTTP server. F-Spot offers all the conventional file management functions: creating directories, renaming files, moving files, comparing files, copying and moving files, deleting files and much more. It lets you drag-and-drop files and manage directory structure. You can tag files and organize them into folders. Spontaneous regression of liver metastases from hepatocellular carcinoma. Hepatocellular carcinoma (HCC) with liver metastasis shows a poor prognosis. Spontaneous regression of the metastatic tumor is rare. We report a rare case of HCC with liver metastasis showing a spontaneous regression of metastases. A 57-year-old woman presented to our hospital with hepatic pain and ascites. A diagnosis of HCC with liver metastasis was confirmed by histopathological analysis of liver biopsy specimens. She was treated with percutaneous ethanol injection therapy (PEIT) and transcatheter arterial chemoembolization (TACE). After two courses of treatment, contrast-enhanced computed tomography (CT) showed a remarkable reduction in the size of the liver tumor. TACE was given three more times until a partial response was obtained. In addition, an extranodal lymph node metastasis from HCC was spontaneously regressed after several cycles of PEIT. After a total of five cycles of TACE, CT showed no progressive tumor. We concluded that TACE is effective in the treatment of liver metastasis from HCC. It may be useful for patients with HCC and liver metastasis to maintain an open mind toward the use of PEIT or other treatments and to decide whether to use surgical resection for liver metastasis.
