Gone is the opportunity for a more aggressive approach to recruiting, thanks to California health care reform. "A lot of our deals didn't include referrals, and it was a little bit, I think, harder for our consultants to close sales after that," Blumberg said. CalPERS officials weren't available to comment about the switch to a broader engagement model. But Davis said he hopes the shift will help the pension fund attract and retain a more diverse set of talent. "The things that make me happy are people who can be themselves and tell stories and engage with people and make people feel good. And there are a lot of people in the community who have that," he said. Davis said he thinks the shift in the investment business will also benefit the company. "You know what, it can be boring to sell the same thing day after day, year after year," Davis said. "But it's really nice to be able to use our investment experience to create something that's exciting. And I think that's going to resonate with our investors." On a recent evening, a wide-eyed woman working in a kiosk at the bank gave a nervous laugh when asked if she thought returning a large bank check in cash would result in a penalty. "No, I'm not that kind of person," she said. "I think in this day and age, it's not that big a deal." Regional economic ca3bfb1094
