Differential effects of pre- or post-treatment with H-89 on the phosphorylation of extracellular signal-regulated kinases 1 and 2 in the central nervous system of the gerbil. The present study was undertaken to investigate whether extracellular signal-regulated kinases 1 and 2 (ERK1/2), which are activated through a pathway that is distinct from the mitogen-activated protein kinase pathway, are involved in the processes that underlie memory consolidation or reconsolidation in the central nervous system. In the present study, we examined the role of ERK1/2 in learning and memory by examining the effects of pre- and post-treatment with H-89, an inhibitor of protein kinase A (PKA), on the phosphorylation of ERK1/2 in the hippocampus and cortex, and on memory retention. ERK1/2 activation in the hippocampus and cortex was observed at 5 min after the training in the water maze learning task and was also observed at 15 min after the training in the elevated plus-maze and fear conditioning tasks. Pretreatment with H-89 (5 microg/0.2 microL) for 4 h significantly impaired the retrieval of the spatial information acquired during the training of the water maze task, while it did not affect learning. On the other hand, post-treatment with H-89 (10 microg/0.2 microL) for 2 h from 30 min after the training impaired both the spatial and fear memory acquired during the training. Phosphorylation of ERK1/2 was elevated at 15 min after the training in the water maze task and in the elevated plus-maze and fear conditioning tasks. Post-treatment with H-89 for 2 h from 15 min after the training significantly impaired the phosphorylation of ERK1/2 in the hippocampus and cortex, and did not affect learning in the water maze learning task. These findings suggest that ERK1/2 in the hippocampus and cortex is involved in the processes that underlie memory retention, while that in the hippocampus, but not in the cortex, is involved in the processes that underlie memory retrieval.
