Greenlight is a Steam game of my own creation, which is a simple story about a man, who, after years of evading the police, returns to his hometown to settle down, only to find his sister missing. In order to find her he has to become a "Hunter", a special kind of cop who hunts down, and neutralizes, criminals. To this effect he starts out with a handgun and a few knives, and some helpful friends. It's a simple, pretty much linear adventure, which offers no real challenge. The gameplay isn't the best either. But it's still a good way to wind down after a hard days work." or Ocellated? Antonio always loved Windows. So what if he was the first one to use a Mac and was the last one to use a Linux system? For the past 20 years, Antonio has been a Windows user, never going to change everything that he loved. He bought a new computer at the beginning of this year and installed Windows 10 as his primary home OS. He didn't make any changes for almost 2 weeks. No, really. His home assistant was ON for 2 straight days. That's kind of a record. When he finished everything on the start-up section, he played whatever kind of music he liked and his desktop was alive: music, pictures, documents. But when he tried to do something new, something didn't add up. He wrote an email to the support section. He opened a PDF file from a friend. He told his assistant to get the laundry ready and go out to shop. Then, something went wrong. The desktop went down. He had to wait for almost a minute to try it again. He had to wait for another almost minute to type the password. He had to wait for even another minute before his assistant told him that it was off. A computer with home assistant was supposed to not be such a pain in the neck. All this time and for how long, he would never know. And he used to say that a PC was made for the user. Logic says that Antonio made a mistake. After 2 months of using Windows 10, he had learnt everything. Why not just wait for 2 weeks and finally learn something? But no, he was right. Aptureboy's theory is that Antonio had the best Windows he could have ever got. It was designed for those who never wanted to touch the desktop at all. That is the best part of Windows. It never gave him trouble. There is no way that Antonio got the best version of Windows. No way in the world. He had all this extra space and whatever he wanted, he got. There was no limit. The time he was using it, he knew that he was using the best Windows ever because his desktop was alive. A PC was made for that! But he doesn't want to be a PC. He never thought of using the computer for what it really was. He used it like a few years ago when using
