Miscreation is the culmination of years of development to create the most creative creature builder around. Strategically control the eight vital parts of your creature - from its head, teeth, limbs and genitals to its arms, legs, wings and tail - and combine their powers to create an army of body parts. Explore a dangerous and different enviroment every time you start a new game. The eight unique environments contain many objects and pieces from which to create your unique, multi-evolved creature. If your creature gets stomped on, you can use a DNA barcode to create new body parts and evolve again! Forget what you know about procedural generation - our unique world editor lets you create worlds of any size and complexity! Build tons of rooms, objects and creatures to populate them with your custom evolved creatures. The editor lets you build and design levels using objects from multiple environments. Place them anywhere using positioning tools. The editor also includes a block-based level editor for building whole levels. The physics engine offers intuitive control over your creatures. Use the 8 touch controllers to control your creature as you play. The DNA Barcode system lets you create new creature parts to evolve your creature in the new area you explore. Collect and share DNA from your creatures to create new parts and evolve your creature! Freely combine DNA from one creature to create a new one! Use new bits and pieces to evolve your creatures! Evolve your creature to survive the toxic grounds! Use powerful new resources to evolve your creature into a fearsome or beautiful creature. Grow your DNA collection to become a master of the body parts! Unique facial structure tool lets you edit, optimize and create new features like eyes, mouths, noses, ears, hair and much more! Advanced genital tool: Choose from hundreds of different facial features to create new creatures!F-type ATPases that are channels of the plasma membrane. The F-type ATPases are the type of ATPases responsible for energy transduction across the plasma membrane. They can be divided into two categories: the F1 ATPases that are involved in energy transduction in mitochondria and chloroplasts, and the F0 ATPases that serve as rotary ATPase to generate the driving force for diffusion-mediated movement of ions, such as phospholipids and ions in the plasma membrane. In this mini-review, we present the structure, function, and regulation of these different types of F-type ATPases.Q: ♦

What's new:

Salient Feature: In this series we will cover various topics that might intrigue you about playing Pathfinder at the table, or just about building a world in which the Pathfinder setting thrives. Today it is about generating ideas for character weapons (beginners), and building creatures. Great Game, Instinctive Action! In early versions of the game, we had a mechanic called ‘instinctive action’. That made fighting and moving much more fun than the current system. Of course, the character didn’t have to wait to act, they could take an initiative just before combat, and then take an inadvertenecy during the combat. And they could change their mind and action again during the combat as well. This was a very fun mechanic, and I really had fun with it. It was also deadly, and gave people the feeling of turning during a fight. But, very quickly the GMs started using actions and traits (G) as ‘instinctive actions’ as well. And even more off topic, it became harder for them to balance their struggles against the character because the performance of the actions like shooting or running (and those come with Trait (T) options) also played a part in their performance. While those are all good reasons to discourage the development of the mechanic. This post looks at it in a different way, and shows you a way to get that same mechanic even though you do not have as many actions and Traits as the PCs do. That is, while you act on the table, the characters can act as well. The set up for this mechanic is as easy as it gets: The player and the GM have a set of dice. The player rolls all her dice and the GM rolls all of his. Whenever the player does an attack or an action, the player rolls the attack or action dice. If he rolls an action dice, he can take the associated action as well. But if he rolls a d20, he rolls one die for the action, and then rolls a d6 for each change and effort. (The class gets die half as many.) Since the player rolls the attack or action one time, and then plays them, taking his action just before the combat, this mechanic makes it easy to play out the combat action. (And you can even leave the realm of direct combat for some wild action!) This mechanic was also meant to make mass initiative
