I made a lot of cool apps and I want to share them with you.Q: Noise Reduction in OSX - Exposure settings So the situation: Mainly I take pictures with an iPhone and then later edit them on my Mac. (I have Lightroom and Instability) Sometimes the exposure difference in the two makes me go crazy, so I am trying to capture the exact exposure. What I have done so far: I use exposure bracketing, 2, 5, 10 and 100. I read up on refocusing, and I am almost certain that is not my cause. I have tried switching on and off the histogram, and it doesn't really help much. I play around with the histogram and I see a fixed range. I then go for other things. What I want to do: I want to increase my shutter speed, but I want to be able to instantly reduce the noise. (Note that I am not talking about the noise in the picture) How can I do this? Edit: More info about my camera. A: The answer to this one is to use something like DxO Optics PRO. It is a free app to compare your pictures and give you feedback. I have been using it for a long time as a lightroom plugin, and now I use it as an app. It has many many filters and settings to use, and it is great, you can try to fit the noise like me, the most important thing is to keep an eye on the histograms while you use it, as changes can happen faster than you can think, you want to have an idea of what is b7e8fdf5c8
