Tumor necrosis factor-related apoptosis-inducing ligand (TRAIL) and TRAIL receptors are constitutively expressed in most tissues and exert their function by binding to TRAIL receptors 1 and 2. When activated, they induce apoptosis in a wide variety of transformed and malignant cells with different mechanisms. Furthermore, the receptors have been shown to play important roles in immune surveillance of the host. Here we review current knowledge about the function of TRAIL and its receptors in immune homeostasis and their potential for developing new cancer therapies. We also review the recent crystal structure of the type I receptor, TRID. 0cc13bf012
