Feature Requirements:For additional information, please see the Development Articles:The march through the Cascades passes through a turbulent landscape of steep, icy slides and knobby peaks. This is the country that defines the sport. It is a rough and tumble environment where altitude, cold and the elements can be crushing opponents like cement. I've never found a tougher sport than climbing. The sport's heroes are steep and cold. It's hard. Crazy and crazy in all of its accomplishments. A sport that is not for the faint of heart. It's this driving spirit that has captivated me and many others in an age where the pursuit of the next best lead, seems to be more like winning the lottery rather than work. Having climbed most of the major peaks in the U.S., does this sport have heart? I believe it does. If I was throwing in the towel, I would say that today's sport of high-end climbing is a sad state. I'm not saying that high-end sport climbers don't want to be the best, but they are desperately focused on the next rung and they are often woefully short on the passion that makes all of us become invested in this sport. The myopia is not as apparent in the local crags, but only because we climb. This week, I wanted to climb and move boulders. My aim was to get serious about climbing again. However, I made time to spend a night in a high-end climbing gym. After a day of nothing, I relented and met a few friends to climb. A couple of our friends from Alaska tagged along. I made it up Emsley and was about to bag the first

Search for conformational stability under variable temperature of biuret-modified sorbents used for the dry phase microextraction of organic compounds. Two glassy sorbents - alkylamines-modified silica and alumina (gel) sorbents were synthesized for the extraction of trace levels of organic compounds using the dry phase microextraction (DPME) technique. The sorbents were applied in DPME at 80°C. The heat treatment involved 120°C for 1h. The sorbents were investigated for their ability to selectively extract and isolate various analytes from synthetic samples. The sorbents exhibited good robustness and stability under variable temperature. The heat treatment caused no significant structural changes in the sorbents. The effects of the operating conditions for DPME were investigated and compared. The validation of DPME-GC-FID method was performed. The proposed method was validated in environmental samples. The limits of detection (LODs) ranged between 0.01 and 0.47ngL(-1). The responses of the proposed method were linear between 0.1-10000ngL(-1) with $r^2 > 0.992$. The relative standard deviations (RSDs) were in the range of 10.92-16.1. Marine Microbiome Microbiota associated with marine life have their own unique structures and functions that give them unique roles. Some are providing support for the whole system, and some play key roles in the physiological processes of their hosts. Understanding the variations in marine microbiomes and how they interact with their host, the sea environment and with each other will provide invaluable clues to predict how biological systems will respond to environmental stresses, such as temperature changes, or to climate change scenarios. Coral-Associated Microbiome Coral-associated microbiota are a key part of coral reef ecosystems. Recent advances in molecular biology, such as single cell genomics, have revealed that considerable diversity resides in the uncultured microbial component of corals, even among coral species belonging to the same family.
