Text size The U.S. political press is fixated on “Russian Collusion” and “Russia Meddling” in the 2016 presidential election. But in their minds, “Colombia” somehow doesn’t exist. Reuters on Oct. 27 reported that Florida prosecutors had “sketchy evidence” that eight men from Columbia were involved in a scheme to obtain political influence at the president’s Mar-a-Lago resort, including to “pay Republican consultant and longtime Trump friend Carl Forti to spread money around the county to support one of the campaigns” in order to enhance Trump’s chances of winning the election. The evidence cited by the news service was thin. But if those eight men really were involved in the scheme, and if the scheme worked, that would be another huge coup for the Democratic Party. As the lead on the story, the New York Times only made a passing reference to the alleged Colombia connection. And that was it. The paper devoted just two paragraphs to Colombia (the first on page six and the second on page 12). The Times didn’t even do an in-depth interview with the eight men in question. Instead, the Miami Herald reported that “[n]ew information in a Miami federal lawsuit casting doubt on the conduct of a federal housing agency suggests that six people affiliated with the Colombian drug trade and the cocaine industry may have helped finance the 2016 election ... to bolster Donald Trump.” Similarities abound. Both New York and Florida prosecutors filed charges against 18 defendants in connection with the alleged scheme, which is reportedly part of an Occ13bf012 thread. Seed dispersal in a dynamic global environment. The frequency and distribution of plant seed dispersers is increasing in many regions of the world because of habitat loss and increased disturbance. In this study, we examine the dispersal of western redcedar (Thuja plicata) seeds via bird seed caches in a northern Idaho ponderosa pine-dominated region with high levels of disturbance. Seed may be well dispersed, even to relatively inaccessible areas, and may occur in a variety
