Wikipedia defines a wavefunction in quantum physics as: a function from configuration space to complex numbers that has the property that the function is square integrable, it is complex-differentiable, and its integral over a region of configuration space is equal to the integral of the wavefunction squared over the same region. I find this description very confusing. Are quantum amplitudes also wavefunctions? A: The amplitude is the quantum counterpart of the classical probability density function. A function  $f(x,y,z)=\mathbf{A}(x,y,z)$  defined on a cube  $\Omega$  can be the amplitude of an elementary process  $X$  to  $Y$ . It is then a probability density function as you say. The integral of  $f$  over  $\Omega$  is the probability of  $X$  given  $Y$ :  $P(X,Y)=\int_{\Omega} \mathbf{A}(x,y,z) dx dy dz$ . If we use the wave-function language,  $f(x,y,z)=\psi(x,y,z)$ , then  $P(X,Y)$  is equal to the integral of  $|\psi|^2$  over  $\Omega$ , i.e.  $P(X,Y)=\int_{\Omega} |\psi|^2 dx dy dz$ .
