It's vital that we all take action to save the Murray-Darling Basin. How you can help: You can now visit gov.au to find out how to get involved. The present invention relates to an improvement in a tire curing machine. Curing machines as shown in FIGS. 14 and 15 are conventionally used to cure tires. These conventional curing machines comprise a pair of right and left curing presses 1a and 1b each having a pair of tire changers 10a and 10b mounted thereon. They are spaced apart from each other by a predetermined distance and a gap G is formed therebetween, so that the press 1a or 1b cannot be operated unless the other press is not operating. That is to say, these two presses 1a and 1b are structured to operate independently from each other. In this type of curing machine, the tires 2a and 2b are sequentially loaded on the tire changers 10a and 10b, then the tire 2a or 2b is inserted into the press 1a or 1b, and the tire is cured. However, in the conventional curing machine, the tire changer 10a or 10b mounted on the press 1a or 1b must be left empty and unused for a while until the tire cured by the press 1a or 1b is unloaded. Also, when the tire 2a or 2b is not loaded on the tire changer 10a or 10b, the operation of the tire 2a or 2b is suspended. That is to say, in the conventional curing machine, it is not possible to
