In the rat pituitary GH binds to a covalently linked single class of high affinity ($K_d = 5.5-7.8$ pM) binding sites that have specificity for GH, prolactin (PRL), and placental lactogen (PL) although another class of sites, characterized by somewhat lower binding affinity ($K_d = 28-40$ pM), has been found to bind specifically to insulin-like growth factor I (IGF-I). In the present work we have investigated whether the appearance of GH binding sites in the rat pituitary and reproductive tract might be regulated by the diurnal and monthly changes in circulating levels of pituitary PRL and PRL-like substance (PLS) and if there might be a link between the temporal changes in pituitary GH binding sites and changes in GH-induced IGF-I or IGFBP-3 gene expression in the uterus. The maximal number of pituitary GH binding sites was observed at 1100 h when PRL levels in serum were at their nadir and PL levels were at their peak. When pituitary PRL binding sites were removed by immunoneutralization, the appearance of GH binding sites in the uterus was similar to that in normal pituitary. After long-term treatment of hypophysectomized rats with ovine PRL (oPRL) the number of pituitary 6d1f23a050
